Editors Dispatch: An auction is defined in our dictionaries as "a public sale where property is disposed of to the highest bidder." But this definition fails utterly when applied to three-fourths of the auction sales of property in this city; for unless the bidder of property in this city; for unless the bidd der bids more, or at least as much, as the wwer has fixed as his value of the proper'y For I was blind, but now I see. offered, he withdraws it, and the bid uers find they have lost valuable time for writing.

SPELING MATORES. - It was observed of the irregular medical practitioner who surmounted his door with the inscription, inviting and reasoning to the trembling victims of tertiso and quartern fevers, " Agers cured," that be obviously did not accomplish his restorative exploits with a spell. The unlearned empicic, amid his pots of febrifuge, of Vermont writes: "I was born and had, it is dear, addressed himself to the art of purging away maladies instead of learning how to spell their names. To him such idle orthographic researches and ingenuities were vsin. An ague by any other name smelled milte as sweet and quaked quite as profouncly, and yielded with equal readiness to the embittered drench and the purgatorial recoction. But if he were alive now, and expected to get patients, he would have to take down his sign. No-body would put trust in a leech who advertised his ability so bunglingly; for just at present there is really something like a spelling mania prevalent in the land. Insecurate orthography is far from being the venisk ault it once was. In old times even the Esther of his Country could trip and stumble amid his vowels and consonants without losing public confidence, or abating a jot of that overwhelming dignity of depertment in which he is said to have slightly exceeded Cato. Now-a-days anybody holding a place of such lustre and conspicuity who spelled badly would find his heroship challenged at least by every pedagogue and every spelling-school champion in the land. Precision and orthodoxy in this particular has come to be considered a fundamental virtue. Your average entry clerk of to-day, lavishing superfluous accuracy on ribbons and calicoes, outspells the First Napoleon; and there is probably not an un-dergraduate from the venerable arcades of Bonn to the newly-shingled portices of Bloomington, where Mr. Tilton introduced his new theories of marriage and morality, who couldn't readily "spell down" Albertus Magnus or George of Trebizond. This is very creditable to the precision if it does not affirm the extent and amplitude of modern cultivation. To spell well may be said to be the beginning of virtue as far as learning is concerned. It is the foundation upon which all intellectual attainments must be reared; and we can therefore only regard this sudden change and furious breaking out of spelling-schools all over the country with of spelling schools all over the country with ping at the post-office, saluted an ill-looking respect and approbation. It is rather odd, it fellow on the step with 'Good morning, is true, to see bald and bulky doctors of di-vinity and lear, middle-aged attorneys crowd-ing the rudimentary ways of learning and elbowing in amiable scholastic compctition the shrewd and precocious louts of the school-room; and it does not diminish the oddity of the spectacle that the old boys are generally spelled down early in the evening, and are subsequently careened over by a lubberly rabble of balt-grown prodigies who enact the most monstrous decasyllabic exploits with diabolical ease and certailty. In an Indiana contest, recently decided, in which all the neighboring parsons and select men took ambitious and eager part, the victory remained with a chuckle-headed youth of seventeen, whose conceit since that concerned has been so intolerable that numbers of the vanquished are looking up hard.

THOSE GOOD OLD TIMES .- An old resident brought up in a log-house with a stone chimney, and well remember the mode of keeping the fire over night, or going half a mile to a neighbor's for a coal in the morning. Many is the meal that I have eaten from a wooden bowl of bear-porridge, or milk and roasted potatoes. I well remember the mode of dress in olden times, when men wore home-made cloth both summer and winter. In summer they were what was called tow-cloth, made from flax raised on the farm, and in winter what they called frocking, made of wool, blue and white striped. The women, too, wore cloth of their own making. They carded and spun the wool and flix. I have now in my possession a pair of old hand-cards, such as they used in those days. I have by me two old wooden calico stamps that were my great-grandmother's, that she used to stamp calico with in old times. I can well remem-ber my old cowhide shoes and the knit leggins, with strings to tie them down. I remember the times when they rode on horseback; my grandmother had one of the oldfushioned pillions to ride behind on; the stirrup was a piece of wood with a leather strap attached to it. I remember the first wagon that came in towo. I have a pair of the old snow-shoes, and have walked many miles on them, and think I could walk on them now, although I have not been on them for several years. I well remember when a man by the name of Levi Crosby used to ride once a week from Somerset to Brattleboro', horseback, for the newspapers, and scatter them at every man's door on the way and over the back towns. But these times are all in the past, and those that took an active part in them are mostly in their graves, where I must soon be myself; yet, when I think over those times it seems to bring new life into my thoughts for the time being."
